

Careers

From day one you're already thinking where you want to be in three years time. Rather than at the end of three years you have got a degree but you don't really have any other skills and you're stuck in a job interview for example and you don't know much.

We have got the Graduate Development Centre which is helpful it teaches you how to compose yourself and how to perform in interviews and how to do your CV. Just basically it shows you what your good at and how to improve at what you're not good at.

The career system has always been strong at John Moores the advice the way that they can sort of do the testing to see what career is best suited to you. There has always been that support. That to me has always been part of the ethos of the University which they are really now bringing out with the new Graduate Development Centre. It's even better now that we have a centre we can send student too.

I was reading that 60% of graduates now come out with a 2.1 or above. So it just gives you that something extra, something you can say well I have done this extra and it will hopefully give you the edge in interviews.
