

Staff at LJMU

From being a student, an undergraduate student at Liverpool John Moores, then staying on as a postgraduate student. I think I have taken for granted how well we are treated and more recently I have got an understanding of how other postgraduate students are treated in other universities and realized how much of a good deal I have got.

A vast number of academic staff here are research active. It is not only important for our own professional development, and we love doing it, but we also make sure we bring it into the class rooms. All the modules that I teach I bring my research into it.

They have been there doing that. They are not reading something out of a textbook to you. They are giving you real experience and telling you what to do not what to do, giving you advice on everything. So I can take the highest confidence in my lecturers defiantly.

I do think that they deliver the subjects well and a lot of them that I have spoken to do have industry experience and when you are having a lecture they always relate it to industry.

The approach is quite informal which I found quite interesting you know, we are at first named terms or what not. And you can approach your staff at any time via email or just knock on the door it's quite and informal you know set up.

They are very personable you feel like you can talk to them. They are really down to earth and will help you at any point if you are struggling, tutor will go through a tutorial. They are always there to help.
