Every year, Liverpool Film Seminar invites six experts to deliver a series of talks. Topics vary greatly and the series does not focus on a specific aspect of film. Instead, a range of genres and approaches are celebrated, from historical reach to the internet’s impact on cinematic material.

Gamine, sex bomb, dumb blonde: Brigitte Bardot as comic star

This illustrated presentation examines a relatively unknown, yet crucial aspect of Brigitte Bardot’s career. While Bardot is known for her sexually transgressive roles in melodramatic films such as Et Dieu ... créa la femme/And God Created Woman (1956), La Vérité (1960) and Le Mépris/Contempt (1963), half of the 43 films in which she appeared were comedies, including some of her most popular at the French box-office. The talk explores the different ‘ages’ of Bardot as comic star, from impish gamine to ‘dumb blonde’, and reflects on both the problematic interaction of sexuality and comedy, and the potentially liberating value of comedy for highly eroticized stars such as Bardot.

Your Town Could Be Their Killing Ground...: Exploitation, “Otherness” and Transgression in the 1960s Biker Movie

Released in 1966 and billed as ‘the most terrifying film of our time’, The Wild Angels laid the way for a slew of low budget, lurid and gratuitously violent movies based around the exploits of marauding motorcycle gangs. This paper explores the nature and significance of this seldom discussed film genre. In their pageant of transgressive machismo, it is argued, the 1960s biker movies conjured with themes of an uncontrolled ‘Otherness’ whose unrestrained lusts and sneering disaffection set it beyond the pale of mainstream culture. Informed by the ‘carnivalesque’ traditions of exploitation cinema, however, the biker genre’s treatment of these themes was avowedly ambivalent. On one level the bestial depravity of outlaw bikers was presented as chilling evidence of a societal order in a state of collapse. But, in other respects, the biker movies revelled in their anti-heroes’ flouting of mainstream tastes and conventions. Ribald and bawdy, the 1960s biker film delighted in tweaking the tail of conformist sensibilities.

Rather than reading the biker movie as an ‘oppositional’ film genre, however, the paper argues that it was a site of conflict and contradiction. While many mainstream cultural norms were certainly flouted in biker movies, they also affirmed many of core values of American popular conservatism. In particular, the biker genre configured the outlaw motorcyclist as a pioneering frontiersman – a ‘last American hero’ who embodied the distinctly masculine and conservative themes of rugged, autonomous individualism.

Killers on the Kilocycles: Radio Noir and the Movie Adaptation Series

Fed by the ongoing fascination with film noir as well as old time radio (OTR) connoisseurship, the concept of radio noir has been gaining an increasingly high profile in recent years. This research seminar examines one of the key forms of US radio noir, the popular movie adaptation series of the 1940s and 1950s. I will explore the range of such programs, the institutional negotiations they involved between broadcasters, the film industry and advertisers, and the problems that beset the attempt to translate Hollywood films into an exclusively audio medium, focussing in particular on several adaptations of the 1944 film Laura.

Biography:

Frank Krutnik is Reader in Film Studies at the University of Sussex and is the author of In a Lonely Street: Film Noir, Genre, Masculinity (1991), Inventing Jerry Lewis (2000) and, with Steve Neale, Popular Film and Television Comedy (1990), as well as numerous articles in critical anthologies and leading screen studies journals. He is editor of Hollywood Comedian Comedy: the Film Reader (2004) and co-editor of Un-American Hollywood: Politics and Film in the Blacklist Era (2007). He is currently working on a monograph on radio noir.
This paper will continue the arguments that the author has developed in her recent research. She suggests that the only way to understand the changes in contemporary culture is through an interdisciplinary approach, that looks sideways across every aspect of visual culture at a new intermingling of images, and which confronts the reasons for this changed landscape – not just the phenomenon of celebrity culture itself, but the worrying alliance forged between celebrity and the fashion industry, in particular the global luxury brands. There is a new tranche of work on ‘celebrity studies’ and, indeed, a new academic journal of the same name; it does not however look at the nature of the new alliances, which have, in fact, created this new dominance and ubiquity of celebrity culture.

This paper – as befits a Film Seminar – will look at the way in which the new power and centrality of celebrity and fashion actually affects not only the content and the casting of contemporary mainstream cinema; arguably, it now dictates what films can be made, and whether or not they achieve widespread distribution. The existing theories around ‘stardom’ need to be reworked. It will focus on Anglo-American cinema and ‘celebrity’ – obviously, Hindi cinema has extraordinarily powerful ‘celebrities’ who can and do dictate style across the Indian sub-continent and within the Hindi diaspora. However, the power of these celebrities is limited to those particular spheres of operation. One of the most disturbing factors of contemporary celebrity culture is its very whiteness, and the fact that it has created yet another form of western imperialism.

Pamela Church Gibson is Reader in cultural and historical studies, Course Director of the MA in Film and Fashion at the London College of Fashion, and Principal Editor of the refereed journal Film, Fashion and Consumption. She has published extensively on film, fashion, fandom, history and heritage.

Her next project will look at the targeting of 'young adult' women, the schisms this has caused within contemporary feminism, and the extraordinarily lucrative nature of the ‘franchise films’ and linked merchandise aimed so successfully at this particular demographic.
